Summary: The Richter house is located at 229 South Van Buren in Kirkwood, St. Louis County, Missouri. Constructed ca. 1890, it is an intact example of Property Type D. Nineteenth Century Vernacular, Subtype: Folk Victorian. It meets the registration requirements for that property type set forth in the MPS Cover document “Historic Resources of Kirkwood, Missouri.” This side gabled frame dwelling exhibits several characteristics common to that property type. As is typical for the Folk Victorian Subtype, it is a relatively small house, with a simple form and a limited amount of Victorian style ornamentation. The one and one-half story house has a symmetrical three bay facade with a central cross gable and a small central front porch. The porch has a shed roof and a small cross gable. Unlike most Folk Victorian houses, which have most of their stylistic embellishment on the front porch, the most notable ornamentation on this house is located on the walls. The house features ornamental wooden shingles on the upper parts of the main walls, as well as in the gable ends. Unusual (for Kirkwood) in its retention of decorative features. It thus retains a high degree of integrity in the areas of materials, design, workmanship, feeling, and association. The house is located near the front of a long, narrow lot at the northwest corner of West Monroe and South Van Buren streets, and retains its integrity of location and setting.

Elaboration: The Theodore Richter House is a one-and-a-half story frame house which retains some ornamentation from its period of construction. The side-gabled house has a shallow overhang, boxed cornices, and gable end returns. The facade is three bays wide, and symmetrical. The central bay has a low cross gable with a single double-hung window, which, together with the continuous band of cornice line trim under the roof, forms a pediment. The central front porch has a shed roof and a smaller pedimented gable accent. The porch supports and balusters are simple square wood. The porch is flanked by single one-over-one windows. The window sash themselves are modern, but are very close in profile and configuration to the originals. Almost all of the windows on the house have original wide flat wood trim, with flat entablatures and narrow sills.

Above the window lintels, a continuous band of molding separates differing wall cladding. Below, the house is sheathed in narrow wood weatherboards which appear to be original. Above the molding line, and in the gable ends as well, the house features decorative wood shingles which are also original or very early. The shingle band, which flares slightly along its bottom edge, consists of alternating wide bands of fishscale and straight shingles. The front gable ends have only fishscale shingles, while the larger side gables contain alternating rows that match those used on the walls. (See photos 1, 3 and 5.)

The shingle band covers all of the front part of the house, as well as an early or original gabled rear ell, which is on the north side of the back. (See photo 3.) The gable end of the rear wall contains only flat shingles. A modern two story addition south of the original rear ell is sheathed with weatherboards which match those used elsewhere on the house. (That addition actually consists of an early one story addition which was extended outward and upward within the last decade.)
addition has a shed roof which extends out from the main ridge; the new line of the shed roof is set back slightly from the original south gable end, which retains full integrity, including its character-defining ornamental shingle work.

The modern addition is not visible from the front of the property, and it has not seriously impacted the overall integrity of the house. The property continues to meets the registration requirements for the Folk Victorian subtype of the Nineteenth Century Vernacular Property type, as laid out in the MPS Cover document “Historic Resources of Kirkwood, Missouri.” In reference to additions, those requirements state that “alterations to rear ells and secondary elevations are acceptable, as long as the basic form and massing of the original building are not seriously impacted, and the scale of any new construction does not overpower the original portion of the building.” The modern addition is on the back of the house, and has obscured neither the original form and massing of the building, nor the ornamentation which defines the Folk Victorian subtype.

The detailing of the interior spaces echo those of the exterior; generally simple, with Victorian touches. The staircase has a heavy Victorian style newel post, with delicate turned balusters. Baseboards and other trim are fairly modest, with some ornamental molding.

The house faces east onto South Van Buren, near the northwest corner of West Monroe and South Van Buren streets. A concrete walkway leads directly from the sidewalk to the front door. The house is set close to the front of the long narrow lot. Mature deciduous shade trees are found throughout the lot, including near the back wall of the house and close to the south elevation, and trimmed yew hedges cover the front foundation. A six foot wood privacy fence encloses the rear yard, which features terraced planting areas behind the house.

Summary The Richter House is significant under Criterion C in the area of ARCHITECTURE. It is representative of the Folk Victorian Subtype of the Nineteenth Century Vernacular Houses property type. The combination of a modest vernacular form with limited Victorian era architectural detailing is typical of the Folk Victorian Subtype. The house meets the registration requirements for that property type set forth in the MPS Cover document “Historic Resources of Kirkwood, Missouri,” and falls under the context “The Town of Kirkwood: Late Nineteenth Century Suburban Growth--1865-1898.” Constructed ca. 1890, is it notable as a rare example of the Folk Victorian subtype. Few intact examples of this simple house type have survived in Kirkwood. The Richter House is a rare surviving example, retaining not only its characteristic modest form, but stylistic detailing as well. It was built ca. 1890 by or for Theodore Richter, who was a carpenter at the time, and who operated a nursery and florist business on this property from 1896 to around 1899. The period of significance corresponds to the construction date of ca. 1890. The house is in very good condition, and it exhibits integrity of location, design, workmanship, and feeling, setting and association.

Elaboration: The Richter house shares many characteristics with Kirkwood’s earliest surviving vernacular residences. The simple vernacular house, which utilized readily available building materials and a modest form, is typical of the houses erected by Kirkwood’s working class residents during the nineteenth century. The use of Victorian ornamentation on that vernacular form categorizes this house as an example of the Folk Victorian subtype. The house was built at a time when the Queen Anne style was quite popular, a fact reflected by its ornamental shinglework. The use of elaborated wall surfaces is a character-defining feature of the Queen Anne style.

Theodore and Lena Richter purchased this property from Columbus Strohm on February 2, 1890. The Richters probably began building this house shortly thereafter, and it seems likely that Theodore did much of the work himself; the St. Louis County Directory of 1893 shows that he was living in Kirkwood by then and lists his occupation as carpenter. It also noted that he owned personal and real property.

The 1896 Directory of St. Louis County shows that he had changed occupations by that time. It notes that he was residing on Van Buren Avenue in Kirkwood, with the occupation of horticulture. Another source shows that he had been in the horticulture business for a few years by then. June Dahl notes in her history of Kirkwood that in “1893 a young man named Theodore Richter established a business on the northwest corner of Van Buren and Monroe Avenues, where he raised a large variety of roses and potted plants, although he specialized in carnations and violets.”

2 St. Louis County Deed records, Book 49, p. 88.

Richter’s line of work represented one of the few commercial occupations available in the community at the time. Although it was the intent of Kirkwood’s founders to exclude all business enterprises in the community (except those services needed for the comfort and convenience of its residents, see MPS “Historic Resources of Kirkwood, St. Louis County, Missouri”), the horticulture industry soon became the prime exception. Professional florists and nurserymen discovered that Kirkwood was an ideal location for their greenhouses. As Dahl put it, “Not only was the air free from industrial pollutants, which damaged growing plants, but the frequency with which the trains made the short run from St. Louis meant that fresh flowers and potted plants could delivered from the greenhouse top the city without excessive damage from heat in the summer or cold in the winter.”

The Richters sold the property to Charles Klingsick of Washington County, Missouri on May 15, 1899. The 1909 atlas map of the city shows that Klingsick still owned it at that time. The house today looks much as it did when it was headquarters for the Richter nursery operation, and it is in very good condition. It is a rare intact example of the Folk Victorian subtype of the Nineteenth Century Vernacular Residences property type. It is also significant for its association with an early commercial activity in this largely residential community.
